Divorce Lawyer in Prince George - The various levels in the BC court system would each handle separate aspects of family law.

Interim orders for access, child support and custody could be acquired through both the Provincial Family Court and the Supreme Court. These are usually acquired at the beginning of the case and remain active until the procedures have ended. Usually, an interim order is granted for one spouse to have full possession of a some family asset. Therefore, the person is ordered to either maintain possession of it or to sell the possession.

Regrettably, even with all the efforts being made by the Provincial Family Court and the Supreme court, family cases still take several months to conclude.
